THE INSURANCE MEDICAL SERVICE WEEK BY WEEK

Workmen's Compensation Cases

A clerk to an Insurance Committee has received an inquiry from a firm of solicitors with regard to a question, which had been raised before the registrar of the county court, as to the right of an insurance practitioner to charge a fee for a report made by him on an insured patient in connexion with a claim under the Workmen's Compensation Acts. The clerk very properly replied that an insurance practitioner is under no obligation to issue to insured persons for whose treatment he is responsible any certificates beyond those definitely provided for in his terms of service. Opportunity may be taken of reminding practitioners that the question whether an injured insured person is entitled to compensation or to sickness benefit is not a matter affecting them in any way. The certificates which they are required to give under the Terms of Service relate solely to the actual fact of incapacity and not to the statutory payments to which the injured person may be entitled. The fact that a patient is in receipt of compensation does not affect the obligation to issue certificates in connexion with the arrangements for sickness benefit. The question of charging for a separate certificate needed for any purpose outside national health insurance is solely one between the practitioner and his patient. Such a certificate could not be given on the official form.

Irregular Medical Certification

Those practitioners who may be unusually susceptible to pitfalls will not be averse from an occasional reminder of possible ways of tripping. Such a reminder is furnished by a case dealt with by the Liverpool Insurance Committee. The insured patient of one doctor called in another insurance practitioner in the same area, in whom, presumably, she had more confidence, and until the transfer to his list could be arranged at the end of the quarter asked him to treat her as a private patient. He did so, received fees for his services, and issued private prescriptions. Notwithstanding this he fell into error by issuing certificates on the official forms. In this way he committed a breach of the Terms of Service, which make it clear that the official forms of certificate must not be used for any patient other than one whom the practitioner is attending—whether as principal or deputy—as an insured person. The pitfall here, of course, is that when a doctor is treating a person whom he knows to be an insured person he is apt to forget that if he is not treating the patient free of charge in his capacity as an insured person he is debarred from using the official forms of certificate. The committee in the case which is here noted expressed the opinion that the doctor should have been aware of his obligations in regard to medical certification, especially in view of the length of time he has been engaged in insurance practice. In particular, it considered it should have been obvious to him that these certificates should not have been issued in this case, having regard to the constant use by him of such certificates, to the note printed thereon, and to the further fact that he was issuing private prescriptions and charging fees for his services. The committee required the practitioner to give an undertaking that he would strictly comply with the Medical Certification Rules in future, and warned him that any further breach of the Terms of Service would be viewed by the committee more seriously.

Summer Leave of Absence

During the summer months it is the practice in London and other large areas for the Insurance Committee to give its consent to an assistant deputizing for a principal up to a period not exceeding one month, or to allow the principal to dispense with the services of his assistant for a similar period, provided, of course, that satisfactory arrangements are made for the conduct of the practice if, for example, the practitioner remaining on duty should himself become suddenly unable to attend to the work. It is clear that during the summer months, when the work of a medical practice is lighter, a committee would not in the ordinary course press for the appointment of a deputy during the summer holiday of either the principal or his assistant. On the other hand, it is noted from a case reported in the minutes of a recent meeting of the Insurance Committee for a large area, that a practitioner proposing to take a month's holiday from the middle of July and stating that his assistant would carry out his duties during his absence was informed that, in the committee's view, he should engage a locum tenens as well. It may be assumed that there were special circumstances in this case not disclosed in the report, which merely states that the refusal to give consent is in view of the number of insured persons on the practitioner's list and of the duration of the proposed absence.

Inadequate Deputizing Arrangements

The following report appears in the minutes of the Birmingham Insurance Committee:

A communication was received from the Panel Committee stating that, arising out of a claim for an emergency fee for attendance on a patient of an insurance practitioner, a discussion had taken place at the meeting of the Panel Committee and all the doctors who live in the region of the practitioner's surgery complained of the inadequate deputizing arrangements made by the practitioner. The practitioner resides at a distance of about $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles from his surgery, and employs an assistant who resides at the surgery. The practitioner promised to arrange for a deputy to provide treatment for the insured persons on his (the practitioner's) list in cases of emergency, and subsequently the committee received a form with regard to deputizing arrangements completed by a practitioner who has a surgery near to the practitioner's surgery, but resides at a distance of two miles therefrom. In view of the distance your subcommittee cannot accept such deputizing arrangements as satisfactory, and the practitioner has been requested to make arrangements with a practitioner resident in the vicinity of his surgery to provide treatment in cases of emergency.

CERTIFICATE ON ANOTHER DOCTOR'S DIAGNOSIS

SIR,—As the writer of the weekly notes on the insurance medical service states, treatment "includes the issue of medical certificates in accordance with the rules." Reference to Rule 18 makes it clear that an insurance practitioner is under no obligation to issue a certificate of incapacity to one of his patients in the circumstances referred to.

"Nothing in these Rules shall impose any obligation on the practitioner to give certificates to a patient during any period in which the patient is obtaining treatment from any other person or from any hospital or institution unless such treatment is being obtained on the instructions or with the consent of the practitioner or under arrangements made by or on behalf of the Minister of Pensions."
