BMJ Press Release

BMJ launches The Medical School Selector

New platform enables prospective students to compare medical schools

BMJ - one of the leading knowledge healthcare providers - has launched The Medical School Selector that enables prospective university students to compare and select medical schools prior to applying.

The Medical School Selector, currently in beta phase, is aimed at prospective university students aged 16-18 years. It is the only tool that matches grades (predicted or actual), subjects and UKCAT scores to the entry requirements of medical schools.

Prospective students can also view and compare medical schools based on information about types of courses, fees, external rankings, how to apply and more.

Engaging with doctors throughout their career is vital to BMJ's Life Long Learning and Career Development strategy. The Medical School Selector, and its accompanying sister website Student BMJ, are the first step in this life long journey.
