group clinical trial because they would cover the whole country for that disease, and the record envelopes would not be burnt. With the full facts plotted the campaign of attack could be mounted on a broad front.

How could this be done? Simply, 1 venture to suggest, by abolishing free choice of doctor, allotting each doctor a section of the population, providing the area covered by five doctors with a team of clerical and nursing auxiliaries, and by drawing up special records relating to the disease under survey. Data could be kept to a pattern and the work encouraged by fortnightly conferences with a doctor responsible for four such areas of five doctors and the facts elicited would be useful and statistically comparable. It is necessary only to realize and to admit that the doctor in the home is the most reliable source of information on disease and the one who sees the greatest number of any kind of illness, at any stage, in any year, in his area, even if the hospital sees a larger number of severe cases from a wider area.

A salaried service it might be, but the doctor would keep his independence, and, realizing his share in the common aim, would have a frame inside which to paint his portion of the community picture, feeling assured that within a set time the entire canvas would be covered and a creditable result achieved. It could put new life and interest into family medicine. What is really killing the general practitioner's interest in the N.H.S. is the realization that his work is a dead end, that nobody wants the endproduct of his skills for any useful purpose. If the nation means seriously to encourage health standards the whole medical profession and its counterparts in Government would have to move together with a series of clear and specific objectives aimed at making the N.H.S. really effective and less expensive.-I am, etc.,

SIR.---May I, as one who has consistently advocated a salaried service since the early thirties, in spite of oceans of abuse, be allowed to sing my hallelujah? A resolution advocating its sober consideration has at last appeared in the agenda of the A.R.M. The case for a salaried service, which is luring thousands of new adherents from year to year, is bound to triumph in the end. It seems rather a pity that it should have taken 20 years of misery, frustration, and degradation before its realization should have been accepted .-- I am, etc.,
