I have been ejected from a regional Hospital, later to it that British influence was reinforced, the form which it eventually took would not be British, and might well be inspired from sources which at the moment none present would approve.

It was true that no one had made any concrete suggestions which might help the general-duty officers of the Colonial Service, and that responsibility rested squarely on the Government. However, it was difficult to see why medical schools or universities could not be persuaded to adopt some of the schemes which had been propounded.
