The BP and the Specialist

Psychiatry

PAUL WILLIAMS

It has been said that all psychiatrists have more in common with their colleagues than with their patients. This is a view that is shared by most doctors and nurses, who agree that the relationship between the patient and the doctor is one of the most important in medicine. It is also true that the relationship between the patient and the doctor is one of the most difficult in medicine, particularly in the case of patients with mental illness. The patient is often reluctant to talk to the doctor, and the doctor is often reluctant to talk to the patient.

Assessment

It has been said that psychiatrists have a tendency to overestimate the severity of their patients' illnesses, and that this is partly due to the fact that the patients are often more severely ill than the doctors themselves. This is partly due to the fact that the patients are often more severely ill than the doctors themselves. This is partly due to the fact that the patients are often more severely ill than the doctors themselves. This is partly due to the fact that the patients are often more severely ill than the doctors themselves. This is partly due to the fact that the patients are often more severely ill than the doctors themselves. Management

In the case of patients with severe mental illness, the management of the illness is often more difficult than the illness itself. The illness is often more difficult than the illness itself. The illness is often more difficult than the illness itself. The illness is often more difficult than the illness itself. The illness is often more difficult than the illness itself. The illness is often more difficult than the illness itself. The illness is often more difficult than the illness itself. The illness is often more difficult than the illness itself.
