Shortlisting Trainees

Democracy reigns in Aberdeen

Towards the end of each year there is an area in general practice for the selection of trainees. This is the first time that this process has been conducted in Scotland since 1979, when the present system of general practice training was introduced. The selection process is conducted by the Training Board for General Practice in Scotland, which is responsible for the selection of trainees in general practice in Scotland.

The selection process is based on a comprehensive assessment of the candidates' qualifications and experience. The candidates are assessed by a panel of experts who are selected from a range of different backgrounds, including medical doctors and general practice trainers. The panel members are also selected on the basis of their experience and knowledge of the candidates' capabilities.

The selection process is designed to ensure that the candidates selected are able to provide the best possible care to their patients. The selection process is also designed to promote diversity and ensure that the candidates selected are representative of the population they are serving.
