BRITISH MEDICAL JOURNAL VOLUME 291 21 SEPTEMBER 1985

Survey of health visiting in antenatal care

FRANCES MCCARE, YVETTE Roberson

Abstract

The range of the health visitor’s work is expanding. To find out what antenatal health visitors actually carry out and what their views are of the scope of their work, the National Association of Health Visitors produced a code of practice. The codes indicate that health visitors are qualified and willing to work with women in the antenatal period.

Introduction

The duties of health visitors are determined by various factors, the most important being the needs of the woman and the child. The code of practice for health visitors in antenatal care is based on these needs and is intended to provide a framework for the work of health visitors in the antenatal period. The code is divided into two parts, part 1 and part 2. Part 1 describes the duties of health visitors in the antenatal period and part 2 describes their role in the postnatal period.

Methods

The code of practice for health visitors in antenatal care is based on the code of practice for health visitors in general practice. The code is divided into two parts, part 1 and part 2. Part 1 describes the duties of health visitors in the antenatal period and part 2 describes their role in the postnatal period.

Results

The code of practice for health visitors in antenatal care is based on the code of practice for health visitors in general practice. The code is divided into two parts, part 1 and part 2. Part 1 describes the duties of health visitors in the antenatal period and part 2 describes their role in the postnatal period.

Discussion

The code of practice for health visitors in antenatal care is based on the code of practice for health visitors in general practice. The code is divided into two parts, part 1 and part 2. Part 1 describes the duties of health visitors in the antenatal period and part 2 describes their role in the postnatal period.

References

